

Three E's of Opportunity

Eager to explore, I am excited to engage with external encounters to extend my educational experience. If it wasn't noticeable, I'm passionate about alliteration. I'm more passionate about communication. As a Public Relation/Journalism major enthusiastic about helping others cross the communication playing field, I'm most passionate about the future of public relations in Washington D.C. I think my skills will greatly complement the needs presented by your organization and the workplace as a whole for three specific reasons.

First and foremost, I sincerely care about living excellence. From a young age, excellence has been the standard to which I hold not only myself, but the environment around me. Phrases like 'good enough' or 'mostly done' are not part of my vocabulary, and are not acceptable answers for the problems in today's society. Every company, no matter what capacity, seeks to provide this excellence for customers, employees, and themselves. Specifically, in the way companies communicate, my desire is to learn from the excellence already being practiced and to contribute and expand upon the foundation built into the workforce.

Education represents another societal standard worth pursuing. Throughout the educational experiences of my childhood, I witnessed a variety of environments, all of which deeply impacted my academic growth. The system in America today, while it has many incredible offerings, it also displays many areas for improvement, and needs a voice to bring it support. Education also refers to the process of learning as a whole. Every generation has room for growth and development, simply needing structure and support for consistent change. This is exactly the process and purpose in which I have been eagerly searching to find a place for my own skills to be utilized.

Not only do these areas of excellence and education inspire me to join forces with the professional field, but expansion propels me forward. I could refer, of course, to the individual expansion of my skills and experience, but on a larger scale, the expansion of education, communication, and excellence is something I want to spend my life pursuing. The change and opportunity that the Washington, D.C. area provides not only the city but also the nation is impressive and something I take very seriously. I want to become a part of the growth and innovation that I am positive will continue to expand in the future.

In closing, the passion I possess for education, expansion, and education lead me directly to you. I'm willing to learn new skills and I'm excited to offer my abilities to serve alongside other leaders in the field. I firmly believe in the holistic power of communications and public relations, and have a personal desire to see these goals come to fruition.

Sincerely,

Kurk Pyros
